Subject: Right of Reply – Daxly.ai Investigation

Hi Stephen,

I am currently preparing a new investigation into Daxly.ai and intend to publish within the next 24 hours.

Before publication, I am giving you an opportunity to respond to the matters I am examining so that your position can be included fairly and accurately.

Daxly's own Privacy Policy states that users' "prompts and context are sent to our AI infrastructure providers." At the same time, Daxly is being presented as sophisticated technology capable of undertaking software engineering, security, DevOps and other autonomous development work.

I am therefore investigating exactly what technology sits behind Daxly and, specifically:

1. Which third-party AI providers, models or APIs does Daxly currently use?
2. Does Daxly use OpenAI, Anthropic, Google, OpenRouter, AIOS or any similar AI aggregation service?
3. Is any part of the Daxly platform licensed, white-labelled or based upon technology supplied by another company?
4. What elements of Daxly are proprietary technology developed specifically by Daxly?
5. Has Daxly developed or trained any underlying large language model itself, or does it rely on third-party models for inference?
6. Who developed the Daxly platform and its claimed agent orchestration, Skill system and workbench?
7. How are customers charged for AI usage, and what relationship does Daxly's pricing have to the underlying cost of the third-party model/ API calls?
8. Are there any connections between Daxly's technology stack and platforms being used by companies such as SHIFT AI or other AI-credit aggregation businesses?

Given our previous history, I am particularly interested in separating what has actually been developed and delivered from what is being claimed in promotional material.

If I have misunderstood any aspect of Daxly's technology or business model, this is your opportunity to correct the record and provide supporting documentation.

Please send your response to me within the next 24 hours. Any substantive response received before publication will be considered and, where appropriate, incorporated into the investigation.

Best Regards
Danny de Hek
